Out of only eight Prime rated events globally, Huntington Beach will be the only stop in North America for 2013, drawing 96 of the world's best men's surfers to compete for the crucial ranking points. Emerging out of the field for this years finals were Brazilian Alejo Muniz versus American Kolohe Andino. Andino took a quick early lead in the finals but on Muniz's first wave, he scored an 8.43. Muniz later added a 7.80 scoring wave to seal up his victory.

"I'm so happy, I can't believe it," Muniz said. "Today marks the four year anniversary of my grandfather's passing and I'd like to dedicate this win to him. This is the biggest win of my career and it's the biggest crowd I've ever surfed in front of. I knew I had to get scores and the waves were dying a little bit with the high tide and ocean really cooperated with me today." Muniz came in to the US Open ranked no. 24. With his victory today, Muniz jumps to no. 15 in the rankings.

The women's final featured Hawaiian Carissa Moore versus the local favorite Courtney Conlogue. Moore was victorious over Conlogue to become the US Open champion and new no. 1 in the World Championship Tour rankings. The women's final brought a dramatic finish to the packed crowd. A late surge and a great last wave by Conlogue had her needing a 8.23 to take the win. But Conlogue fell just short only scoring a 7.77 to give Moore the win by only 0.73 points.

"To be honest I'm a little shocked right now because I thought Courtney won when the crowd erupted on that last wave," Moore said. "I let her go and I had priority and it was a bad decision, but I'm stoked that it worked out in my favor. I was happy to be in the final and Courtney's in the title race and I had fun, but I was definitely nervous at the end of that heat. It's such an honor to win this event in front of this big crowd, I feel amazing!"
